Laminin-511 alone stimulates secretion and activation of plasminogen and fibrinolysis in human endothelial cells. The basement membrane (BM) glycoproteins laminins are multifunctional regulators of cell growth and differentiation. Laminin-511, the most common isoform expressed in the human circulatory system, has been implicated in important physiologic and pathophysiologic functions. The aim of the present study was to examine the effect of laminin-511 on activation of plasminogen and fibrinolysis in endothelial cells (ECs) in vitro. When compared to resting human umbilical vein ECs (HUVECs) laminin-511 enhanced plasmin generation by 4-fold and stimulated binding of plasminogen to HUVECs by 2-fold. These effects of laminin-511 were observed to be independent of cell proliferation or interaction with vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF) or basic fibroblast growth factor (bFGF). There was no evidence for dependence on tyrosine phosphorylation of the plasminogen receptor, G protein-coupled receptor 1, in ECs. However, laminin-511 enhanced EC-mediated generation of plasmin inhibitor-1 (PAI-1) that was dependent on VEGF secretion. Elevated levels of PAI-1, accompanied by loss of active urokinase-type plasminogen activator (uPA) in ECs treated with laminin-511, were accompanied by diminished ability of ECs to invade Matrigel. These data suggest that specific laminin isoforms, such as laminin-511, regulate the expression of matrix proteases and their inhibitors, and may thereby influence regulation of fibrinolysis in the vessel wall.The present invention relates to a Fused Flap Valve System and to a method of operating a Fused Flap Valve System.
