02) Initial Inquiries

Approaching the town requires walking up a rough trail with swaying corn on either side. Two scarecrows can be seen watching over the ripening crops, but there's no sign of anyone working in the fields. A few locals are in the street when the posse enters town, but they lower their heads and walk in the opposite direction. A Notice roll reveals they are afraid of something.

Curiosity should hopefully get the posse to investigate the body and thinning population more closely.

Aside from grabbing folk off the street, the saloon is one of the most likely places to engage the townsfolk in conversation (with Preach Samuel Dicks) and one of the few remaining patrons hunched over drinks in the establishment (owner Angus McTavish). Regardless of who is asked, the NPCs give the same information.

Asking about the body provokes the following conversation and more ominous reply.

💬 That body is some no good outlaw who came through this town a month or so back. Outlaws and bandits take our women and goods whenever they please. We're simple folk, mister, and once we might have tolerated it as long as they moved on. But one day they went too far and murdered our mayor—we had no choice but to bring him to justice. We hung him and strung him up as a warning.

Questions about the town's dwindling population provoke a more ominous reply.

💬 Ever since that outlaw was hung we've had a murder each night. Grisly, horrible! We've stopped...

Worse, these particular beasties live in an area of ghost rock deposits. Ghost rock powder has become infused into their armor, giving them a strange ability—they burst into intense flame when they die. This has stopped them turning on each other, since both victim and killer get fried.

The gold mine is still productive and even the ghost rock deposits could be exploited. Once the critters are gone, the posse can set up their own mining business. Details of how much work is involved, the amount of deposits left, and annual income the mine earns the cowpokes are left to the Marshal to
